PREFACE

In order that a dictionary should be suited to the popular demand for such a work, it ought to possess the three important qualities of Accuracy, Completeness and Convenience.

It must be accurate, for misinformation is worse than no information at all. Sound knowledge is wealth, but unsound knowledge has no value whatsoever.

Completeness in a condensed dictionary means that it should contain all the words of the English language in general use, and that are not confined to a dictionary of technical terms.

Convenience should be sought by making it possible for the reader to find instantly whatever he is seeking, and to find at the same time the details relating to the subject, such as the spelling and pronunciation of plurals, the proper use of capital and small letters, the formation of irregular verbs, and finally, the origin of the different classes of words, so that he can appreciate how far-reaching are the sources of our mother tongue.

These and other essential points, it is believed, have been duly observed in the preparation of the present work. Its choice of words has been made for usefulness and for general information. The vocabulary is arranged in strictly alphabetical order, making quick reference easy, while the size of the type is large enough to render a close and painful scrutiny unnecessary.

The pronunciation of each word is plainly indicated by phonetic spelling, according to the best usage of the most cultivated persons.

The definitions, though concise, are sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all the most subtle distinctions and modern meanings, and are in every respect accurate and reliable.

The highest authorities on the different phases of the English language have been carefully consulted and compared; while the value of the book is largely enhanced by the monographs which have been written by eminent specialists to form a part of the Introduction. The interest is increased by the many new illustrations and by the varied collection of facts set forth in the Reference Library at the end.

In the long history of Lexicography which begins in the vast temple-libraries of Babylonia, to the Greek Philetas, then through the Roman period, the Middle Ages, and to modern times, there has been a lexical development under whose influence different schools arose and different types of lexicography have been developed. In England, Samuel Johnson reached the summit in spite of his personal eccentricities, his positive ignorance of many subjects, his poverty, and his lack of patronage. For his robust force of intellect, displayed through many years, enabled him to complete what was then very far in advance of any existing dictionary of the English language. It drove its competitors from the field and won so great a vogue as to be a standard among all English-speaking peoples.

Not for many years afterwards was its supremacy challenged. This occurred when Noah Webster, in 1828, put forth his American Dictionary of the English Language. Dr. Webster for a long while had pondered over the subject of lexicography; and he came to his task with a full mind and with a definite conception of certain fixed principles as to what ought to go into the making of every dictionary. In the introduction to his original work, he sets forth these principles so clearly and so convincingly as to constitute what we may call a Websterian method. The principles thus laid down, if followed carefully, entitle any lexicographer to call his book "Websterian," whether or not Webster himself ever had a hand in making it, or whether any part of it be taken from a work of Webster. Many others have made dictionaries. Even some of Webster's descendants have done so; but in every case it may be said that by violating or forgetting the fundamental laws of Noah Webster they have lost the right of using either the name "Webster's" or "Websterian." It is worth while to summarize in brief the five rules that were first set forth by Dr. Webster in 1828 and were reprinted in every other dictionary made by him until his death.

In the first place, he believed that our language, because of its unusual orthography, should be made clear to the reader by the use in dictionaries of a simple form of phonetic spelling.

The orthography itself should be slightly simplified, but not so far as to obscure the origin of the words. This moderation explains why Webster's spelling took instant hold upon his countrymen; whereas, the so-called "Simplified Spelling" of to-day is either rejected altogether, or adopted ignorantly or made a fitting source of ridicule.

The vocabulary of a dictionary should contain not merely those words which belong to literature and the language of the drawing-room, but coarse and vulgar words as well; for such words are often the oldest in the language and give to the philologist a clear and luminous explanation of origins and relations.

Etymology, or the derivation of words, should also be carefully embodied in a dictionary to an extent that may reveal the marvelous and multifarious sources of our mother tongue.

Finally (and here Dr. Webster sends a piercing dart at Johnson) he says that the definition should always be simpler than the thing defined. Webster, himself, had a wonderful gift of clear and lucid definition. He showed the higher learning which regards simplicity as more truly the mark of a scholar than complexity.

Bearing these five rules in mind, it is believed that the present dictionary is in every way Websterian; for it has followed out the precepts of Noah Webster without varying them at all. Furthermore, a large portion of its vocabulary and definitions, upon which modern scholarship has been unable to improve, is incorporated in the body of the work.

In the belief that the demand for a convenient, complete, reliable and modern dictionary has been met by the production of the present volume, it is hoped by the publishers that the work will meet at the public's hands a favorable reception.

THE ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF DICTIONARIES

BY

JOHN C. ROLFE, PH.D.

Professor in the University of Pennsylvania, President of the American Philological Association and of the Classical Association of the Atlantic States, Formerly Professor in the University of Michigan, etc., etc., etc.

The word dictionary in its broadest sense includes word-books of every kind. To these, various names are applied with more or less consistency. An index is a list of words in alphabetical order with the place where they occur, but without definitions. When the words are listed in connection with the sentences of which they form a part, we have a concordance; and when definitions are added, a vocabulary. A glossary is a list of rare, obsolete, or dialectic words. A dictionary or lexicon gives the words of a language with more or less completeness, with their etymology, their forms, and a full list of their meanings, illustrated by examples.

The word dictionary (sc. liber) was first used by Joannes de Gorlandia in 1225; the more common dictionary makes its appearance in the next century. Although from its derivation (from the Latin dictio) a dictionary strictly means a word-book, the term has been extended to books of information such as dictionaries of Antiquities, of Geography, of Dates, of the Bible, and the like. A dictionary which aims at completeness is often dignified by the title Thesaurus (a treasure-house), while a dictionary of names is sometimes called Onomasticon (a name-book).

The growth of dictionaries has been a gradual one, and its progress is marked by a comparatively small number of epoch-making works, each of which held the field for a long period of time, either directly or indirectly. There are two types, those in which the words of one language are defined in terms of another, and those in which the words of a language are explained in the same language.

In the seventh century before our era we find Babylonian and Assyrian syllabaries, made to explain the ancient ideographs by means of phonetic values; and the early "dictionaries" of the Chinese, which they assert that they have had for three thousand years, were doubtless of the same general character. The making of dictionaries in the true sense of the word began among the Greeks, and although only a very small part of their vast output has been preserved, such specimens as we have, together with the references in extant writers, enable us to trace the growth of the science with considerable exactness.

The study of Homer by schoolboys first led to the making of glossaries, to explain the obsolete, poetic or dialectic words. These appear as early as the fifth century before our era, and reference is made to them by Aristophanes in one of his comedies. The scope of these glossaries was gradually extended and their arrangement improved, until Philletas of Cos (c. 325—c. 265) compiled what may be called the first lexicon to Homer.

The founder of the science of lexicography, however, was Aristophanes of Byzantium, the fourth head of the great Library at Alexandria and the ablest philologist of antiquity. He wrote a great lexicon treating various classes of special words, sometimes referred to as separate works, which served as a source for generations of lexicographers. The indefatigable Didymus of Alexandria (c. 65 B. C.—c. 10 A. D.), surnamed Chalcenteros, compiled a lexicon of the diction of tragedy and comedy and other special dictionaries, which also served directly or indirectly as sources for later works. The first general Greek lexicon was begun by Zephyrion and finished by Pamphilus of Alexandria (c. 30 A. D.). This work, which was in part a dictionary and in part an encyclopædia, was a huge one, for an abridgment of it made in the time of Hadrian consisted of thirty books. An epitome of this in five books was made by Diogenianus, and this work, or perhaps a further abridgment of it, with additions from other sources, has come down to us under the name of Hesychius, together with the lexicon to the Ten Orators of Harpocration (second century) and the Onomasticon of Julius Pollux, of the early third century. Athenæus (c. 200 A. D.), whose Deipnosophistæ has been called a lexicon in the form of table-talk, mentions thirty-five makers of dictionaries whose works have entirely perished.

From the Byzantine period the lexicon of Photius (c. 820—c. 891) Patriarch of Constantinople, is of great value in the study of the historians and orators. That of Suidas, which was apparently written between 976 and 1026, appears to have been based on an epitome of Hesychius with additions from many good sources. This is in part an encyclopædia, and it is illustrated by passages from the ancient Greek writers, including Christian writers. Although the work is of great value to scholars, it is marred by gross carelessness and a lack of methodical arrangement. In many cases the names of the writers who are quoted are not given, and sometimes the passages which are cited have no relation to the article in which they stand. Some allowance must doubtless be made for interpolations, and we may accept the verdict of Justus Lipsius, pecus est Suidas, sed pecus auret velleris.

The works of the early Roman poets presented special difficulties, because they were adaptations from Greek originals. We therefore hear of glossaries at Rome at a relatively early period. The first and only great lexicon produced by a Roman was the De Verborum Significatu of Verrius Flaccus, of the time of Augustus. This was an attempt to collect and present the obsolete and obscure words which had been gathered in a long series of glossaries. Since it included names of persons and places, and discussed questions of grammar, orthography, and antiquities, it was both an encyclopædia and a dictionary. It was illustrated by quotations ranging from the earliest monuments of the literature down to the Augustan Age; and after the author's death it was largely epitomized.

The revival of learning gave a new impulse to lexicography, and old glossaries and vocabularies were hunted up and copied. The humanists of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, however, busied themselves more with stylistic than with purely lexical questions, and a good specimen of their work is the Elegantiarum Linguae Latinae libri VI of Lorenzo Valla (1407-1457). An epitome of this work was made by Erasmus, and it is still useful. The Catholicon of Giovanni de Balbi of Genoa (Johannes Januensis), which was the first work in the Latin language to be printed (Mainz, 1460), was more of the nature of a dictionary.

The Dictionarium of Ambrogio Calepino (Calepinus), published at Reggio in Northern Italy in 1502, contained more quotations from the classical literature. Calepinus at first gave his definitions in Latin; but other languages were added in successive editions, until it finally became a polyglot dictionary in eleven languages. Its vogue was so great, that "Calepino" became a synonym for "dictionary," and in France calepin is still applied to a polyglot lexicon.

The beginning of modern scientific lexicography was made by Robert Estienne (Robertus Stephanus), a member of the famous French family of printers and scholars. He began with a revision of Calepinus, but found the work so inadequate that he published an independent Thesaurus Linguae Latinae in 1531. This great work in its successive revisions held the field for more than two centuries, the only independent work being the Glossarium ad Scriptores Mediae et Infimae Latinitatis of Charles du Fresne, Sieur du Cange, published in 1687, which is still supreme in its field. Gesner's Thesaurus of 1749, although based upon Stephanus, so modified the book as to be a real contribution to the subject. It has been the basis of Latin lexicography in Germany.

The Lexicon Totius Latinitatis of Forcellini also owed its beginning to an attempt to revise Calepinus, and again the result was an independent work, published first at Padua in 1771 and several times revised and enlarged. The last edition by De Vit (Prato, 1858-1875), in six volumes, with a separate Onomasticon as yet unfinished, is to-day our most complete Latin Lexicon. Its main defect is due to the failure of the reviser to bring the text of the citations up to date. In the meantime a large number of special lexicons and school dictionaries have appeared in Germany, in particular the Handwörterbuch of K. E. Georges, which contains a remarkable amount of material and is frequently revised, and that of Stowasser (Vienna, 1894; new ed. by Petschenig and Skutsch, 1910).

In England and America, recent Latin lexicons have been based on the work of Wilhelm Freund (1834), to which the excellent introduction on the principles of Latin lexicography gave a temporary importance which it did not otherwise deserve. A revised translation by E. A. Andrews (1850) was the basis of the Harper's Latin Dictionary of Lewis and Short (1879).

The project of a really complete Latin dictionary, in all respects abreast of modern scholarship, was agitated in Germany nearly a century ago. For various reasons, and fortunately for the success of the plan, little was done until 1884, when Eduard Wölflin founded the Archiv für lateinische Lexikographie und Grammatik, the purpose of which was to prepare the way for a great Thesaurus of the Latin language. A large number of collaborators had been secured and much material collected, when the four leading Academies of Germany (those of Berlin, Leipzig, Göttingen and Munich) and the Vienna Academy agreed to furnish 500,000 marks in twenty annual instalments, a sum which, with the income from the sale of the volumes, was believed to be sufficient for the purpose. A new collection of material was made, complete down to the time of Tacitus, with excerpts from the later writers. The printing of the great dictionary began in 1900, and the fifth volume, containing works beginning with D, is now in process of publication. The Thesaurus is a dictionary in the strict sense of the term, and proper names, which at first were admitted, but treated from a purely lexical standpoint, are now relegated to an Appendix.

An eminent Greek scholar recently expressed the opinion that the time is not yet ripe for a Greek Thesaurus. The Thesaurus Linguae Graecae of Henri Estienne, son of the author of the Latin Thesaurus of the sixteenth century, first published in 1572, is not yet superseded. In Germany, however, a number of the revisions of this work have been so thoroughgoing, as to constitute independent works. That of Passow (1786-1833), afterwards revised by a syndicate of scholars, is perhaps the best Greek Lexicon, although its supremacy is not undisputed. Du Cange added to his dictionary of late Latin a Glossarium ad Scriptores Mediae et Infimae Graecitatis in 1688, which with the Glossary of Late and Byzantine Greek of E. A. Sophocles (1860), explained in 1870 into a Greek Lexicon of the Late and Byzantine Periods, cover the post-classical epochs.

The first trustworthy Greek Lexicon for English-speaking students was published by Liddell and Scott in 1848, and was based upon Passow. It was revised and enlarged by Drisler (New York, 1850), and later by the original editors. Its eighth edition is the standard for those who depend upon books in the English language.

Dictionaries of the modern languages came later than those of Latin and Greek; but appeals for greater attention to the mother tongue were made by Dante in his De Vulgari Eloquentia and later by Cardinal Bembo; and to-day nearly all the languages spoken by the nations of Europe have their great standard dictionaries. These have been composed on two widely different principles, the first of which gradually gave way to the second. The former was that followed by the Académie Française, whose members believed that the function of a dictionary was to establish a standard of usage. Their first dictionary therefore omitted technical terms and all words which did not receive the stamp of academic approval. The principle now generally adopted is, that the dictionary is an inventory of a language and should therefore, when unabridged, record all the words of that language. As a matter of fact no dictionary in existence quite does that, for certain classes of words are wholly or in part excluded, such as indecent words, slang, foreign words which have not been completely naturalized, and the like. In the selection of the words to be admitted there is of course room for great difference of opinion. The dictionaries of the modern languages usually indicate with more or less exactness the accepted pronunciation, and here again there are divergent views.

In England the first lexicons were designed as helps to the study of Latin, such as the Promptorium Puerorum or Medulla Grammaticae of 1499 and the Ortus Vocabulorum, or Garden of Words of 1500. The first dictionaries of the English language were confined to the definition of words whose meaning was difficult to understand, and the earliest work of this kind was the English Exposition of Hard Words, published by John Bullokar in 1616. This was succeeded by works of the same general character by Henry Cockeram (1623) and Thomas Blount (1656), whose Glossographia was an explanation of obscure legal terms, while the dictionaries of Edward Phillips (1658), Elisha Coles (1677) and John Kersey (1708) added an increasing number of the commoner words.

The first work of a general character, in which a complete collection was aimed at, was the Universal Etymological English Dictionary of Nathan Bailey (1721). This, like nearly all the standard dictionaries of different periods, was revised at first by the author and after his death by various hands, and in its successive editions reigned supreme until the appearance of Johnson's great work. Bailey gave the ety-mologies of the words and indicated their pronunciation by means of accents. His dictionary included many technical and legal terms, together with "the Etymology and Interpretation of Proper Names of Men and Women and Remarkable Places in Great Britain."

In 1747, Samuel Johnson, who had been invited by a syndicate of booksellers to prepare such a work, addressed his Plan of a Dictionary of the English Language to the Earl of Chesterfield. In this he laid down the principles which he proposed to follow, illustrating them by numerous passages from the best known English writers, which at the same time showed the necessity for a new dictionary. The nobleman appears to have paid little attention to this address or to its author; but Johnson nevertheless undertook the task and labored at it until his own patience and that of his publishers were well-nigh exhausted. Millar, who had charge of the printing of the book, exclaimed when he received the last pages of the manuscript: "Thank God! I have done with him!" to which Johnson replied, when the remark came to his ears, "I am glad that he thanks God for anything." It is needless to say that the 1575 pounds, for which Johnson had agreed to make the book, had for the most part been spent in the pay of six amanuenses and other incidental expenses, and that the author received little compensation for his labor.

As the work neared completion, Lord Chesterfield was desirous of having his name appear as its patron. He accordingly published two flattering letters in the London World, announcing the appearance of the new work and commending the plan and its execution. Johnson however, who was indignant at the neglect which he had suffered, in a brief and dignified letter declined to accept this tardy aid. He says: "I hope it is no very cynical asperity not to confess obligations where no benefit has been received, or to be unwilling that the public should consider me as owing that to a patron, which Providence has enabled me to do for myself." Some have characterized Johnson's letter as unjust and impertinent, and have asserted that he made considerable use of Lord Chesterfield's suggestions in the preparation of his book. At any rate the Earl made no reply to the letter, and although he attempted through common friends to appease the angry lexicographer, the Dictionary appeared in 1755 without a dedication to a patron.

Johnson's Dictionary marked a new era in English lexicography, particularly in the attention which was given to the historical development of the language, abundantly illustrated by well-selected quotations. In the indication of pronunciation it did not however advance beyond the simple system followed by Bailey. Although the author gave much attention to the derivation of words and prided himself on this feature of his work, his original contributions in that line have been entirely superseded, a fate which overtook all his successors and critics until the modern days of scientific etymology.

Although Johnson to some extent disarmed criticism of his definitions by the statement in his Preface "that a few wild blunders and risible absurdities might for a time furnish folly with laughter and harden ignorance into contempt," some of them were none the less derided, such as the classic one of network: "Anything reticulated or decussated at equal distances with interstices between the intersections." In some cases he used them as a vehicle for the expression of his personal feelings and prejudices, as in that of oats, which he defined as "a grain which in England is given to horses, but in Scotland supports the people," to which Lord Elbank retorted: "Yes; and where else will you find such horses and such men?" His definition of a pension as "An allowance made to anyone without an equivalent. In England it is generally understood to mean pay given to a state hireling for treason to his country"—did not prevent him from accepting a pension himself in his later life.

Johnson's Dictionary was the standard for many years, and it was reprinted and revised by many hands, the best edition being that of the Rev. H. J. Todd (London, 1818), which was itself reissued several times. The advances which have been made since Johnson's time, besides the addition of new words, have been especially in etymology, a science which has been revolutionized since his day, and in the accurate and systematic indication of pronunciation. The latter topic first received special attention at the hands of William Kenrick (1773) and Thomas Sheridan (1780), the father of the famous dramatist. The Critical Pronouncing Dictionary of John Walker (1791), an actor and lecturer on elocution who had previously issued a Rhyming Dictionary, to which Byron acknowledges great indebtedness, was regarded as an authority on pronunciation for many years, and was often reprinted. Substantial contributions were also made by William Perry (1805). In etymologies progress was made by Charles Richardson, whose Dictionary (1837) is also a storehouse of well-selected quotations from the best English writers. In his Preface, Richardson criticises the plan of Johnson's treatment of derivations, and still more the manner in which it was carried out, and adds: "So far the name of Johnson has been an obstacle to the advancement of Lexicography in this country; it has commanded admirers and supporters; and it has deterred competition." But Richardson's original work in etymology has gone the way of all the early attempts in this line.

The first great lexicographer of America was Noah Webster (1758-1834). His work in its final form was the gradual outgrowth of earlier essays in the same field. He published a Dictionary as early as 1806, and the first edition of his American Dictionary of the English Language appeared in 1828. The latter may justly be called an independent work, since it was based upon a new collection of material and was advertised to contain 12,000 words and 40,000 definitions not found in any previous work. As the title implies, this was distinctively an American dictionary, admitting words which had heretofore been regarded as provincial and using as illustrative quotations from American writers, as well as from British literature. In the selection of the former he purposely refrained from confining himself to the best writers, rightly believing that "language was not an instrument so much of literature as of daily association," and that "the dictionary should be a book of reference for the plain reader and a guide to him in the correct use of the vernacular." In accordance with this idea his work was of a didactic nature, and gave elaborate rules for the proper spelling and pronunciation of words. In the former especially he introduced numerous novelties, some of which have met with general acceptance by subsequent lexicographers. His system of indicating pronunciation did not go beyond the earlier simple methods, and he had little belief in the elaborate use of symbols which has since come into vogue. But this was consistent with his firm conviction that simplicity was essential to usefulness.

In his earliest Dictionary, Webster had introduced an Appendix, and this together with the admission of a great number of scientific and technical terms with full and explicit definitions, such as that of telescope, gave his American Dictionary something of an encyclopædic character, which has been more marked with each successive issue. The work appeared in several editions during its author's lifetime, and it has been continued since his death under the general editorship first of Chauncey Allen Goodrich (1790-1860), his son-in-law, and afterwards of Noah Porter (1811-1892), formerly president of Yale College. Although the Dictionary still bears the name of its founder, it has come in course of time to represent the work of many scholars, and its characteristic features have been to some extent modified or dropped.

For many years the supremacy of Webster's Dictionary was disputed by the dictionaries published by Joseph Emerson Worcester (1784-1865). After various preliminary essays in the field of lexicography, including an abridgment of Webster and an edition of Johnson (in Chalmers's abridgment of Todd), combined with Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary, Worcester published a series of dictionaries of his own, which culminated in the great Dictionary of the English Language (1860). Worcester differed from Webster in treating the language subjectively rather than didactically, believing that it was the province of a lexicographer to present the language as it existed, rather than to endeavor to improve it according to his own theories. He differed from Webster also in many points of pronunciation and spelling, and while the "war of the dictionaries" which the supporters of the rival works waged for many years has passed into history, each dictionary still has its adherents.

A prominent feature of modern English dictionaries has been the gradual inclusion of encyclopædic matter, in the choice of words, in the full explanation of technical instruments and processes, and in the free use of pictorial illustration. This tendency was given a fresh impulse by the English Dictionary, Technical and Scientific, of John Ogilvie, first published in 1850. It appeared in several editions, finally as the Imperial Dictionary of the English Language, and has had a profound influence on the general character of subsequent works. A very great English dictionary in the strictest sense of the term, that is, a pure word-book, excluding encyclopædic information, is The New English Dictionary, a task of many years but now approaching completion under the auspices of the English Philological Society,—a book, however, that only libraries and persons of wealth can afford to possess.

THE ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE

By ALBERT STANBURROUGH COOK, PH.D., LL.D.

Professor in Yale University

The English language was originally spoken on the Continent of Europe. Some time in the fifth century—the traditional date is 449—the Angles and Saxons from Schleswig, Holstein, and the neighboring islands to the west and southwest, began to pass over to Britain in such numbers as to leave a permanent trace on the page of history. Attracted, no doubt, by the greater wealth of the more highly civilized country, they made themselves, in process of time, masters of the south-eastern seaboard of what we now call England, and began to drive the inhabitants back into the interior. Eventually they confined this race, the Celtic, almost wholly to Wales, Cornwall, the Scottish Highlands, and, across the narrow seas, to Ireland. The civilization they found in Britain was, on the whole, rather Roman than Celtic, since Rome had built fortresses and roads, established cities, and promoted trade.

These Angles and Saxons (there was a tribe of Jutes also, but they play a much less conspicuous part, and may for our purpose be disregarded) were of the Germanic race, akin to the Swedes and Norwegians, the Danes, the Dutch, and the Germans of our day, or, more strictly speaking, to the ancestors of the latter. These various Germanic tribes spoke what may be called dialects of the original language, which itself was, so to speak, a dialect of a greater unity, the Indo-European language, other branches of which were Greek, Latin, Celtic (represented, as we have seen, by modern Irish, Welsh, and Highland Scotch), and the Sanskrit of the Hindu Vedas.

The earliest specimens of the various Germanic languages—Gothic, Old Norse, Old High German, Frisian, English, etc.—look sufficiently unlike one another when they are superficially compared, though deeper study reveals likenesses and virtual identities at first unsuspected; but they are alike in this respect, among others, that they are all inflected languages, like Greek or Latin, though the most of them are much less highly inflected than either of the latter. The essential difference between an inflected and an analytic language consists, of course, in the fact that the relations between words and ideas, which in the former are largely indicated by the endings or occasionally by the prefixes of words, are in the latter more frequently indicated by other words, or by the mere position of words in relation to one another.

As the simplest possible illustration—in the phrase man's son, man's is an inflected word, in which 's (for original -es) is a suffix to the word man, and expresses the relation between man and son; if we say son of man, this same relation is expressed by another word, of. It follows that, in general, inflected tongues are able to express the same thought in fewer words than analytic languages. Thus in the familiar Latin phrase, habeas corpus, "that you have the body," the single word habeas stands for three English words; and in another legal term, scire facias, "do you cause (lit. make) to know," the one word, facias, also represents three English words. In Matt. 20, 18, the Latin Bible has Filius hominis tradetur, where the Authorized Version has the Son of man shall be betrayed; here three words do duty for seven.

But there is another characteristic of inflected languages—that of designating mood, tense, number, etc., when an analytic language might take them for granted. Thus in the Old English Gospels of about 1000 A.D. we have the sentence, Foxas habbath holu, "Foxes have holes"; here the -ath represents the indicative present plural, and shows that this is a declarative sentence expressing a present (or universal) fact, and that its subject, Foxas, is plural. In Modern English all this is taken for granted save the fact that the subject is plural, indicated by have instead of has; but even have is also at times used for the singular (I have) and the infinitive (to have).

The inflections of the oldest English have a tendency to be leveled in process of time: that is, all the vowels, except e, of inflectional (or other) endings have a tendency to become e, and this e to be pronounced, not like the e of pen, but as we pronounce the e of houses. Thus the Foxas of the year 1000 would, a couple of hundred years later, appear as Foxes, and the earlier habbath as habbeth. In course of time this e would no longer be pronounced, except in words like foxes, where it was needed. In other cases it would either be represented by the apostrophe (in the possessive singular, e. g., the fox's tail), or be dropped, or be retained in the spelling, but not pronounced, as in Modern English name, for which Old English has nama (pronounced námah), and the English from 1200 on name (orig. pron. námeh).

The tendency to level other vowels under e (a neutral üh-sound) is phonetic, that is, it is a normal sound-change in unstressed syllables. But another cause was at work to produce what has been called form-leveling, according to which an ending is replaced by a different one under the influence of analogy. Thus by the twelfth century the form habbath has become in one dialect, the Midland, habben, not because the sound of th became that of n, but because the -n was borrowed from forms like the subj. pres. plur. hædden, the subj. pret. plur. hæfden, or even the ind. pret. plur. hæfdon. This final n then tended to disappear, as in our past part, bit, whose longer form is bitten. But analogy had another effect upon this plural. For how did habben, which could only have given us hab in Modern English, become have? Again through form-leveling. The Old English ind. pres. 2d sing. was hafast (f pronlike v), and the 3d sing. hafath (later hæfth). Accordingly, a borrowing of this haf- (= hav-) took place as early as the twelfth century (hafen), and by 1300 the form have appears.

About the year 1000, Luke 9. 58, was translated into English as follows:

"Tha cwæth se Hælend, Foxas habbath holu, and heofones fuglas nest, sothlice mannes Sunu næfth hwar he hys heafod ahyld."

In a manuscript of a hundred and fifty or seventy-five years later we find this text substantially the same; but hæbbeth has taken the place of habbath, hole of holu, fugeles of fugas, nystas (for nestas), of nest, and Sune of Sunu. Of these the first three and the last represent phonetic leveling, while the fourth shows the effect of analogy, or form-leveling.

A closer examination of this verse will be instructive with reference to the development of the language. Tha regularly becomes tho, as it is found in Chaucer, and later disappears except as an archaism (= then).

Cwath survives as an archaism in the form quoth. Se eventually gives place to the. Hælend (= healer, or healing one, hence Saviour) is, like Ger. Heiland, the translation of Jesus; it lasts till about 1225, and then disappears from the language, being replaced by Saviour (from Old French Sauveour, Lat. Salvator), which enters English about 1300. Foxas persists in the form which it had assumed by the twelfth century. Habbath has been already discussed. Holu becomes holcs, by analogy. And remains. Heofones regularly becomes heaven's, and fugas (compare Ger. Vogel), fowls. Nest becomes nests, by analogy (as already before 1200). Sothlice becomes modern soothly, and is found as an archaism in Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel. Mannes becomes man's, and Sunu, Son. Nafth (= ne + hæfth, not has), persists only in the nob (from nabban) of hobnob. Hwar (or rather hwar) becomes where. He is he, and hys (properly his), his. Heafod becomes hed by the thirteenth century, and head by the sixteenth, through the stages heved and hevd. Ahylde (= a + hylde) disappears very early, but hyldan, the simple verb, is still found disguised in "the ship keels."

If now we examine this verse in the Wyclifite translation (about 1388), we find it reads as follows:

"And Jhesus seide to hym, Foxis han dennes, and briddis of the eir han nestis, but mannus Sone hath not where he reste his heed."

Only the following words require comment. Seide is an Old English word, slightly modified in form. To is from Old English. To hym translates Latin illi, omitted from the earlier version. The -is, -us of foxis, briddis, nestis, mannus, represent -es (with the neutral or obscure sound). Han occurs, side by side with haven, as early as the thirteenth century. Dennes is from Old English denn, which, like nest, is a long neuter in Old English (like Mod. Eng. deer), and takes no ending in the plural; here it has -es by analogy. Old English brid means nestling, but by 1225 it was used for fowl or bird; in Scotland larger birds are still called fowls, and smaller ones birds. Eir in the sense of sky occurs about 1300; it is from Old French air, Lat. aer. Not is from Old English naht (ne + a + wíht, not even a whit), which yields naught, nought, as well as not. Reste, from Old English, is the subjunctive, following the Latin reclinet (about 1440 the Gesta Romanorum has: "The Sonne of man hathe not wer he may reclyne or enbowe his hede").

Tindale's epoch-making translation (1528) reads as follows:

"Jesus said unto him, Foxes have holes, and bryddes of the ayer have nestes, but the Sonne of man hath nott whereon to laye hys head."

The further history of this verse in English may be briefly summarized. The Great Bible (1539) has where; the Geneva Version (1557) spells dyrdes; the Rheims Version (1582) has foules for bryddes (going back to the original word), inserts the before foxes and foules, has where, and prefers repose to laye; the Authorized Version has where; the Revised Version has the foxes, and the birds of the heaven, besides where. It thus appears that by far the most considerable changes took place between the Old English rendering, about 1000, and the Wyclifite, about 1388, and that the most important of these had occurred by the early part of the thirteenth century. The language of the verse changed comparatively little between Wyclif and Tindale, 138 years, and even less in the time that has elapsed since.

We may now draw certain general inferences from the specific facts presented in the last paragraphs:

1. The Old English language was quite sufficient for the purposes of such translation as this of the Bible.

2. The translation being directly from the Vulgate, it is evident that the form of the sentence was largely determined by the Latin; this however, is far less true of the order of words.

3. A large proportion of the Old English words have survived to the present, though in some cases so disguised as to be hardly recognizable.

4. Leveling and analogy will account for many changes in the form of words derived from Old English.

5. In the course of time French and Latin words (Saviour, air, recline) take the place of native, English ones.

6. Since several of the nouns are identical in form with verbs—fox, hole, fowl, bird, air, nest, head (e. g., the book was foxed; to hole a billiard or golf ball; he went fowling or birding; they aired their knowledge; eagles nest in trees; he headed the procession), it follows that the frame of the sentence is determined, in many cases, quite as much by the evident meaning of the words, and their relative positions, as by connectives or the few inflections that remain. Thus, since the subject usually precedes the verb, we assume that in the sentence, The fox caught the bird, it is the bird that is caught, though certain birds (of prey) might catch (small) foxes, and if Birds foxes catch should occur in a line of poetry, one could hardly be sure, without knowing the context, which was caught.

English has uncommon facilities for borrowing and assimilating words from other languages. With a few verbs of the old stock, like be, have, come, etc., a supply of prepositions and other particles (articles, personal and relative pronouns, etc.), a few inflections (like -s for the plural of nouns and the pres. 3d sing. of verbs, -de for the past tense of verbs, and -d for the past participle), the language may and does appropriate nouns, verbs, and adjectives from other tongues with the utmost freedom, and even convert one part of speech, after such borrowing, into another, as we saw in the case of air, above. Hence the substitution of polysyllabic Latin words for short English words may give a sentence a quite different tone, while its grammar remains unchanged. A case in point is from Boswell's Life of Johnson. Talking of the comedy of The Rehearsal, Johnson said: "It has not wit enough to keep it sweet"; but immediately repeated the thought in this form: "It has not vitality enough to preserve it from putrefaction." If the first sentence had run, "It has not wit enough to keep it from rotting," the parallel would have been perfect.

The larger part of the very extensive Modern English vocabulary—quite three-fourths—is made up of borrowings from other tongues, the greatest single contributions being from Latin and French, the French, in turn, being almost wholly derived from Latin. A few Latin words must have been already in use among the Angles and Saxons when they came to Britain. Such are the words from which we have street (via strata), wall (vallum), pound (pondus), mint (moneta), wine (vinum), bishop (episcopus). These, and a few others, constitute what is called the Latin of the First Period. After their establishment in Britain, and before the Norman Conquest, a much larger number of words was borrowed, representing the Latin of the Second Period, such as our belt (balteum), candle (candela), devil (diabolus), line (linea), minster (monasterium), soap (sapo), tile (tegula). The Renaissance drew freely upon antiquity, so that a very large number of words, many of them terms of scholarship, were then taken from Latin. Such Latin words add dignity, weight, and sonority, and are often effectively introduced to contrast with the briefer English words, as in the following lines from Macbeth:

No, this my hand will rather
The multitudinous seas incarnadine,
Making the green one red.

After the Norman Conquest (1066), French, being spoken by the conquerors, soon came to be regarded as denoting the superiority of those who employed it. Among the first French words recorded in English are these: castle, countess, court, empress, justice, miracle, peace, prison, privilege, procession, rent, standard, tower, treason, treasure, war. Some of the words introduced by the Normans replaced the native English expressions: such words of French origin are, throne, crown, sceptre; mercy, grace; peace, war, army, victory. In other cases the native words persist by the side of the foreign ones, so that we have arms, battle, county, and people, as well as weapons, fight, shire, and folk. Since the eleventh century the influence of French upon English has never ceased, being potent in the time of Chaucer, in that of Shakespeare, in that of Dryden, and at the present day.

It might be supposed that the language of the British Celts would have made a considerable impression upon their conquerors; but, except for place-names, only a very few Celtic words have come to us through Old English: dannock, brat, brock, down (hill), dun (the color). Examples of later Celtic are: from Irish, bog, brogue, shillelagh, shamrock; from Highland Scotch, cairn, clan, plaid, slogan; from Welsh, coracle, cromlech, flannel.

Though the incursions of the Danes began in 787, and in 1016 a Danish king began to rule over England, the influence of the Old Norse upon English is much less than might be imagined. From this period come such Scandinavian words as fellow, knife, husband, call, take, wrong, law, arrow, earl, viking. A good many words were introduced at later periods, such as odd, ugly, fog, geyser, jib, oaf.

The direct influence of Greek may be said to have begun with the Renaissance and the study of Greek literature. During the past century many scientific words have been drawn from this source, such as telephone, ceramics, iodine, sphygmograph, isothermal. Other words from Greek are: epic, lyric, church, organ, music, abyss, chaos, conc, lamp, thermometer, pneumonia, myriad, ambrosia, asphodel.

Italian influence upon English begins as early as the fourteenth century, but no extensive borrowing of words took place before the Renaissance. Of Italian origin are madonna, piano, sonata, soprano, vista, stiletto, lava, volcano, macaroni, doge, and many others.

Scarcely a language can be named from which English has not drawn one or several words. No attempt will be made to enumerate more than a few. From Spanish are: duenna, grandee, hidalgo, armada, tornado, merino, negro, sherry, cigar. From Dutch: boor, frolic, brandy, wagon, yacht, sloop, yawl. From Hebrew: cinnamon, Sabbath, cherub, seraph, amen. From Arabic: alcohol, algebra, cipher, zero, zenith, arsenal, admiral, assassin, tariff, elixir, coffee, cotton. From Persian: caravan, bazaar, divan, dervish, ghoul, shah, jasmine. From Sanskrit: brahmin, pundit, jungle. From Japanese: bushido, jinrikisha, saké, geisha, Mikado. From Chinese: tea, typhoon. From various American aboriginal languages: canoe, hammock, potato, tomato, tobacco, cocoa, squaw, wigwam, tomahawk.

In the case of the more cultivated languages, their influence is often inappreciable in terms of borrowed words as compared with that which they have exerted upon thought, sentiment, and the music or vigor of the phrase. Thus the Italian of Tasso is at work in the following lines from Spenser's Faerie Queene, though not a single Italian word is to be found in the passage:

The silver sounding instruments did meet
 With the base murmure of the waters fall;
 The waters fall with difference discreet
 Now soft, now loud, unto the winds did call;
 The gentle warbling wind low answerèd to all.

The periods of the history of the language are sufficiently recognizable, but can only be approximately dated. The following table represents such an approximation:

Early Old English (English of Alfred)	Before 900
Late Old English (English of Ælfric)	900-1100
Transition Old English	1100-1150
Early Middle English	1150-1250
Late Middle English (English of Chaucer).....	1250-1400
Transition Middle English	1400-1485
Early Modern English	1485-1650
Late Modern English	1650-

Standard English is a dialect. In Old English four dialects can be distinguished: (1) Kentish, in the southeast; (2) West Saxon, south and west of the Thames; (3) Mercian, between the Thames and the Humber; and (4) Northumbrian, between the Humber and the Firth of Forth. Of these the two former may be grouped as Saxon, and the two latter as Anglian. These dialects maintain themselves in the Middle English period, though Kentish is often included with West Saxon, and the resultant three are then known as Southern, Midland, and Northern. It is from the Midland, especially the East Midland, that literary English has sprung. This was because it was better understood by Englishmen from every district than either of the other dialects, because it was the language of London and the Universities, and because Chaucer and Wyclif gave it great currency in literature.

One of the chief marks of the Southern dialect is the substitution of v for initial f, and z for initial simple s (not s + cons.). Thus the Ancren Riwe (ca. 1225) has, in Luke 9. 58: Voxes habbeth hore [their] holes, and briddes of heovene hore nestes. The feminine of vox is vixen (compare Ger. Füchsin), which has thus been borrowed by Modern English from the Southern dialect, and used in a peculiar sense. The best literary representative of current Southern English is William Barnes (1801-1886), the Dorsetshire poet, from whom these lines are taken:

When birds do zing, an' we can zee
 Upon the boughs the buds o' spring,
 Then I'm as happy as a king,
 A-vield wi' health and zunsheen.

The Northern dialect is best represented in modern literature by the Lowland Scotch of Burns and more recent writers. One of its characteristics is the use of a or ai where standard English has o, as in the line,

Scots, wha hae wi' Wallace bled,

My heart is sair, I daur na tell.

The variation between American and English speech scarcely amounts to a dialectic difference, and if there are forces that tend to emphasize it, there are others at work to diminish it.

There has been no room to trace even in the barest outline the changes of pronunciation and of spelling from Old English to the present. We have rather been concerned to trace the process by which English has become to a certain extent a grammarless tongue, while retaining the power to wield vast numbers of words derived from every possible source, while continually increasing its sway over the nations of the earth, and while serving equally for science and history, for the plain speech of everyday people and the loftiest flights of oratory, for the organ-music of Milton and the most delicate lyrics of Tennyson or Shelley.

PRINCIPLES OF GRAMMAR

GRAMMAR, (from the Greek γράμμα "a letter of the alphabet") is the art of speaking, reading, and writing correctly. It is comprised in four main divisions:

1. ORTHOGRAPHY, which treats of letters, syllables, separate words, and spelling.
2. ETYMOLOGY, which explains and describes the sources from which the words of our language come, together with their classes and modifications.
3. SYNTAX, which treats of the relation, agreement, government, and arrangement, of words in sentences.
4. PROSODY, which treats of the laws of poetry, of poetic prose, and in general of VERSIFICATION. The study of punctuation, manner of utterance, and poetical figures, is closely allied with Prosody.

I ORTHOGRAPHY

ORTHOGRAPHY (from the Greek ὀρθογραφία, "correct writing") is the art of accurate and approved spelling (Anglo-Saxon, spel), and is of essential importance in the study of the English language. It cannot be acquired wholly by means of rules, since the requisite number of rules would be an impossible burden; nor is it a more practicable method to learn the spelling of a few score words by rote. A few general principles, however, easily remembered, and based upon custom and tradition, will prevent any person from writing in a way that calls attention to his carelessness in spelling. These are given below and, if carefully studied, will be found more useful than a long treatise on the subject.

The following words ought to begin with capital letters:

- The first word of every sentence.
- The first word of every line of poetry.
- All names, including pronouns, applied to God.
- Proper nouns.
- Adjectives derived from proper nouns.
- The names of the days of the week.
- The names of holidays.
- The names of the months.
- The pronoun "I".
- Any leading name which the author wishes to make emphatic.

When a word ending in silent e is increased or augmented by a suffix beginning with a vowel, the e is omitted; as, give, giving; sense, sensible; fame, famous; cure, curable. The e is changed into i before fy and ty; as, pure, purity, purify; active, activity. When the silent e is preceded by v, c, or g soft, it is usually retained before able and ous; as move, moveable, peace, peaceable; courage, courageous. The e is also retained before ful, less, ly, ment, ness, some, ty; as, peaceful, nameless, wisely, excitement, whiteness, wholesome, surty.

It is an established rule in the English language that words which end with the vowel e, and lengthen the sound of a preceding vowel (as in file, write, endure), should drop the e on receiving a termination and becoming a derivative, if that termination begin with a vowel (as er, ed, ing, ance). Thus file—filer, not fileer, filing; endure, enduring, endurance, not endurancee. But in cases where the e affects the sound of a preceding consonant it forms an exception; as in a word with a soft g, or where, in juxtaposition with another e, it forms one long vowel; thus, singe, singeing; see, seeing.

Monosyllabic words ending in a single consonant, not preceded by a long vowel, and words of more than one syllable ending in a single accented consonant, and of course not preceded by a long vowel, double the final consonant in all the derivatives which are formed by a termination beginning with a vowel; as fit, fitted, fitteth, fitting; bar, barred, barreth; abet, abetted; compel, compelled. Without this doubling of the final consonant, the vowel in the accented syllable of the primitive word (that is the e in abet) would be pronounced wrongly in the derivative (abetted, etc.), namely, with its long sound—fited, bared, abeted. Hence the reason why verbs having the long sound of a vowel do not double the last consonant; as feared, defiled, bloated.

Words ending in a single consonant, but not having the accent on the last syllable do not double the final consonant in derivatives; as limit, limited; civil, civility; enter, entered.

A word ending in ll usually drops one l on becoming part of a compound word; as all, always; fill, fulfil; full, fruitful; till, until. But there are some exceptions to this rule; as recall, refill, uphill; which retain the orthography of their monosyllabic roots.

Words ending in y, preceded by a consonant, change the y into i on receiving an augment; as holy, holier; happy, happiness; pity, pitied. Exceptions—before ing, ish, and s, the y is retained; as lying, babyish, for pity's sake; also in dryness, slyly, shyness.

When the y is preceded by a vowel, it is retained; as boy, boyish; day, days; joy, joyful. Exceptions—gaiety, said, paid, laid.

II. ETYMOLOGY

By

CLARENCE L. MEADER, PH.D.

Professor in the University of Michigan

Etymology in its broadest sense is a science which aims to give account of a nation's vocabulary, by discovering and describing the elements of words, by determining their changes in sound and meaning, and by tracing out the sources of borrowed words.

All living languages are in a state of continual flux. An American of to-day pronounces far differently from an Englishman of Chaucer's or King Alfred's time. Not only the sounds, but also the meanings of words vary, perhaps over even wider ranges. New meanings arise and old ones are forgotten. Thus Old English selig, which formerly meant "fortunate, happy," but it has become modern silly. In two other ways the language is continually altered and enriched: (1) by the rise of secondary derivatives, e. g., Byronism, motor-cycle, and (2) by borrowing from foreign languages, e. g. chauffeur, from contemporary French. These borrowings and changes have the effect through their gradual accumulation of entirely transforming a language.

To illustrate, the revised version of John 8, 21 reads: "He said therefore again unto them, I go away, and ye shall seek me, and shall die in your sin; whither I go, ye cannot come."

Wyclif's translation, made in the fourteenth century, runs: "Therefore eftte Ihesus seyde to hem, Lo! I go, and yee schulen seeke me, and yee schulen die in youre synne; whidir I go, yee mowne not come." The close resemblance of this passage to modern English is largely orthographic. The sounds differ widely. English spelling has changed but little in four centuries. If one could hear Wyclif read the passage aloud, the differences would be very striking.

The Old English (West Saxon) translation, made about the year 1000, is as unintelligible to most moderns as its Latin original would be: "Witodlice eft se Hælend cwæð to him: Ic fare, and ge me sēcað, and ge sweltað on eowre synne: ne mage ge cuman yder ic fare." English texts exist three centuries older than this last. In the language of that more remote period the above verse would seem still stranger.

The radical changes in English sounds are illustrated by the following words: Old English (eighth to eleventh centuries) bāt (pronounced bät)=Mod. E. boat; O. E. hāl (hāl)=Mod. E. whole; O. E. gēs (gās)=Mod. E. geese; O. E. gōs (gōs)=Mod. E. goose; O. E. dēman (dāmān)=Mod. E. deem; O. E. hwīl (hwēl)=Mod. E. while; O. E. mōna (mōnā)=Mod. E. moon; O. E. nū (nōō)=Mod. E. now; O. E. fūl (fōōl)=Mod. E. foul; O. E. hælan (hālān)=Mod. E. heal. The hypothetical primitive Germanic forms of these words, representing a much earlier stage, are as follows: baitoz, halloz, gansiz, gans, domyan, hwila (pron. χulla), menon-, nu, fuloz, hailyan.

The changes in inflectional forms, depending both on sound changes and on psychological motives, have been equally extensive. To illustrate, Old English possessed six case forms of the word moon: Monað, monaþes, monað, monaþas, monaþa, monaþum. These have now been reduced to two, month and months (month's and months' being merely orthographic variations). The ideas formerly expressed by case, tense, mood and personal endings are now conveyed by adverbs, prepositions, auxiliary verbs, order of words and other means. It should be here remarked, not only that such changes in sounds and inflections have affected all native English words, but that borrowed words, on becoming naturalized, are affected in like manner. Furthermore, phonetic changes do not take place capriciously or arbitrarily, but in accordance with regularly operating laws. To illustrate, in the examples cited above O. E. ā (long) becomes modern English ō, and this will regularly hold true of O. E. long ā vowels not preceded by a w. This regularity of sound changes is of the greatest importance to the etymologist. [The creation of new words through phonetic changes is discussed below.]

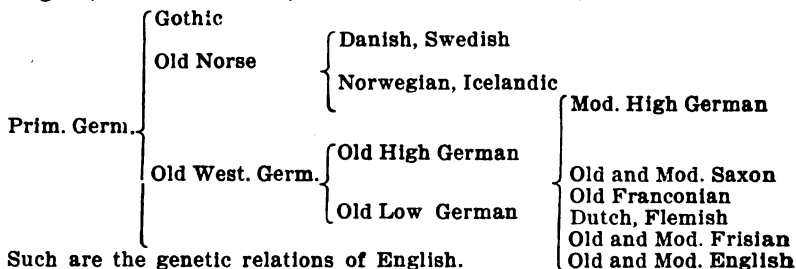

The ultimate sources of these changes are the variations of sound and meaning in the speech of the individual. In each individual such variation of pronunciation is occasioned in one and the same word from hour to hour and from day to day by the state of his emotions, by the stress, pitch, rapidity, and loudness of utterance, by chance physiological and anatomical conditions, and by other numerous and fluctuating factors. However, the desire to make one's self understood, the instinct of imitation, the fear of ridicule, the training of the muscular movements of the organs of speech, along with other conditions, prevent the sudden rise of excessive changes of either form or meaning. Thus is preserved a close general resemblance in the speech of all the members of the same linguistic community. This constitutes a dialect. The boundaries of such communities (some very large, others very small) are primarily determined not by physico-geographical conditions, although these often play a large part, but by social interests—political, economic, commercial, religious, etc. In America in the nineteenth century with its railways, telephones and other means of rapid communication, its books and newspapers, and its schools in which a standard language is taught, dialect areas are large and their boundaries vague. Residents of Boston, New York, Chicago, New Orleans and San Francisco notice comparatively few striking differences in each other's speech. But in England in earlier days, as also to a large extent at the present time, dialects covered relatively small areas and were very pronounced. Under favorable conditions the lines of demarcation between adjacent dialects become so sharp and the changes in each proceed so far, that the speech of one community becomes unintelligible to the others. In this way new languages, the French, Spanish, Portuguese, and Italian, for example, arose from Latin dialects, and thus English developed from the Old Germanic.

The rate of linguistic change depends upon a variety of factors. Race mixture (due to migration or conquest), the growth of culture and material civilization, and close social contact with foreign nations (commonly the result of more intimate commercial relations) are among the most important of these factors. We may now observe how these conditions together with others have affected the development of the English vocabulary.

In the dim dawn of prehistoric Europe, perhaps in the Bronze Age, we can discern traces, faint but certain, of the existence of communities now called the primitive Indo-Europeans. They spoke a language from which were derived most of the living European languages and many of those now spoken in Asia. We know something of the life of this people. We know also that from time to time they sent offshoots to (1) Southwestern Asia and Asia Minor, (2) Greece, (3) Italy, (4) France and the British Isles, (5) Germany and (6) the Slavonic lands. Isolated from their kindred and doubtless commingling with other peoples, the dialects of these offshoots developed into new languages:* (1) Aryan, from which Sanskrit and Old and Modern Persian arose, (2) primitive Greek, the parent of Ancient and Modern Greek, (3) primitive Italic, the parent of Latin, from which came the Romance tongues, (4) primitive Celtic, the source of modern Welsh, Irish and Scotch-Gaelic, (5) primitive Germanic, and (6) primitive Balto-Slavic, which has yielded Russian, Polish, Lettish, etc. Primitive Germanic, like the other branches, broke up into sub-dialects as the community speaking it expanded, and still newer languages,—Gothic, Scandinavian, German and English,—blossomed forth, as shown in the following outline:

Such are the genetic relations of English.

Three Old English tribes, dwelling in the coast lands, both north and south of the Elbe, crossed the sea in the fifth and sixth centuries and permanently occupied the island of Britain. The Jutes settled chiefly in Kent, the Saxons elsewhere, south of the Thames and in Middlesex and Sussex, the Angles north of these, extending as far as the Forth. The Angles split up into two dialect groups, the northern (Northumbrian) and southern (Mercian). After the year 827 the West Saxon attained considerable ascendancy as a literary language, chiefly in consequence of the conquests of Egberht (802-839) and the literary efforts of Alfred (died 901). In the fifteenth century the dialect of London, which stood rather closer to the Mercian (or Central) English, became a standard literary and official language, in consequence of the administrative and commercial importance of the metropolis, the intermediate character and location of the dialect between north and south, the widespread influence of the writings of Chaucer and Wyclif, and the introduction of printing, London being the center of the publishing business. This standard English has for a long time been gradually leveling the modern descendants of the above-mentioned dialects. American English is one form of it.

The pronunciation, inflections, syntax and vocabulary of the invading tribes were quite pure West Germanic. About 4,000 (including some hybrids) of the 14,300 words treated in Skeat's etymological dictionary are classed as pure Germanic. The majority of them doubtless go back to primitive Indo-European. Yet, before the English left the mainland, they had adopted a few Latin words, e. g., dish (Lat. discus, from Greek *δίσκος), chest (Lat. cista, from Gk. κίστη), ark (Lat. arca). After the occupation of the island, contact with the original Celtic inhabitants brought an influx of Celtic words. These words are extremely difficult to trace, but dun, "dark brown," seems to be a tolerably certain example. The invasions of the Danes in the ninth to the eleventh centuries brought numerous Scandinavian (North Germanic) words, which are included in the 4,000. To this source may be assigned with more or less certainty about 350 primitive words, some extremely common, e. g., the pronoun same, which supplanted O. Eng. ylike. But the number of words derived from Celtic and Scandinavian is slight in comparison with the enormous contributions which the Latin language has made directly or indirectly to our vocabulary. Of the early Roman occupation of Britain (42 A.D.-411) there are a few traces, for example, street (Lat. strata),—chester in Winchester and other geographical names (Lat. castra "a camp"). With the rapid spread of Christianity, however, after the year 597 came extensive Latin influence, due to the fact that Latin was the official language of the Roman Catholic Church, and that the Latin Vulgate was the original of all the early English translations of the Bible. Specimens of the words borrowed at this time are mass (Lat. missa) and pope (Lat. papa). By far the greatest, though in this instance indirect, contribution from Latin followed in the wake of the Norman conquest, which culminated in 1066. The Normans were Scandinavians, who had established themselves on the northern coast of France and had adopted the language of the district, the Norman French, which had previously developed from Latin. This Norman French (the form it assumed in England is now called Anglo-French) was extensively spoken and written in court and administrative circles until approximately the year 1400, having succeeded the West Saxon in this function. The period 1250 to 1350 was the one in which most vigorous borrowings from this source were made. They may be counted by hundreds. At the time when Anglo-French began to fall as a copious source of new words, two other channels of Latin influence opened. The first was direct, for Latin itself came to be used for recording the proceedings of Parliament and in various legal documents. Furthermore, classical studies have been vigorously prosecuted in England during the last four centuries, and the rapid rise of the natural, mathematical and humanistic sciences has necessitated precise technical terms. The second channel was indirect, through French, as before, but this time through continental (especially Parisian) French, which has been extensively studied in England since the fifteenth century. The word chauffeur is perhaps the latest witness to the close contact of the two peoples. About 8,000 of Skeat's 14,300 primary words belong to this class.

When we turn to the consideration of the non-Germanic and non-Latin elements of our language, we meet with two historical facts of great importance: (1) these words, with comparatively few exceptions, came in after the year 1500; (2) they reached us by two entirely different channels: (a) colonization and commerce, (b) the study of foreign literatures.

Although English commerce was encouraged by various circumstances from the beginning of the twelfth century on, yet it was not until the early sixteenth century that England was in a position to come forward as a strong rival of Portugal, Spain and the Netherlands. The discovery of the West Indies in 1492 and of a sea route to India in 1498, the establishment of the East India Company in 1600 and the foundation of Jamestown and Plymouth were followed by a rapid development of commerce; and since 1800 England has maintained her rank as the foremost commercial nation in the world. The opening up of the extensive foreign relations entered upon by England since 1500 has greatly enriched our vocabulary. Most of our borrowed Spanish words and quite a number of Sanskrit and Persian words (as maharajah, pundit, darbar) came in by this route. The more important non-Indo-European languages that have contributed are: the native languages of North and South America (e. g., tomahawk and raccoon, from Algonquian; cacao, coyote, tomato, from Mexican; llama, from Peruvian; cayenne, from Brazilian) and the native languages of Asia and the Pacific islands (examples: tea, from Chinese; jinriksha, from Japanese; boom-crang and kangaroo, from Australian; tattoo, from Tahitian). There are also some words from African languages. These words have come to us, either directly or (quite as commonly) indirectly, through the mediation of Spanish (in the case of many Mexican, West Indian and Arabic words) and other tongues. If we exclude a large number of geographical proper names, these words are seen to be mainly nouns, the names of various commercial commodities, or of local plants and animals.

On the other hand, it has been chiefly through the study of the Greek and Italian literatures, to which the English have assiduously devoted themselves for some four hundred years, that these languages have contributed to our vocabulary. About 80 Italian words have reached us directly in this way, and some 1,400 fairly common Greek words. In addition to these there are, of course, several thousand technical scientific (especially medical) terms derived from Greek.

From Skeat's etymological dictionary we learn that there are about 14,000 primary words in English, while the entire number of words recorded in a recent Dictionary is about 325,000. Exclude from this last number the numerous technical terms, and the majority of the residue are derivatives and compounds of a portion of this 14,000. This statement will convey some impression of the important part played by the processes of secondary derivation and compounding, the principal forms of which are as follows:

(1) REDUPLICATION and ITERATION, as in the excited imperative, come, come!

(2) COMPOUNDING OF FORMERLY DISTINCT WORDS. Compound words are usually, if not always, designations of some one non-homogeneous object, quality, action, state or relation. Of the component parts of the word, one is commonly a designation of some specific, prominent quality of the object, action, etc.; the other a more general characterization. Less commonly the two elements are strictly coördinate. The unity of the object, action, etc., themselves provides the psychological basis for the unity of the compound. Illustrations: wool-dress, bred-n-buttr (=bread-and-butter), Hay-Pauncefote-treaty. The following examples illustrate the variety of combinations of various parts of speech that occur: even-tide, oak-tree, Tues-day, blood-shedding, alder-man, two-fold, self-confidence, self-confident, wash-tub, sea-sick, bare-foot (boy), (little) barc-foot, life-giving, good-looking, high-born, brow-beat, white-wash, cross-question, up-to-date, ne'er-do-well.

(3) SECONDARY DERIVATION BY PREFIXES AND SUFFIXES. No sharp line can be drawn between this type of word-formation and composition. The psychological processes underlying them have much in common, but analogy plays a less prominent part in composition. In fact, prefixes and suffixes are in part derived from previously independent words. In English there are about three hundred prefixes derived from divers sources, but many (perhaps two hundred) of these, like v in van, are no longer felt as such; and many more have ceased to be employed in forming new derivatives. Un- and anti- are still freely used. English suffixes are so numerous and varied in form that a systematic classification of them is impossible. Many go back to primitive Indo-European times, some grew up in the primitive Germanic period, others are more recent, and not a few are of Latin and Greek origin. Suffixes, like prefixes, tend to fuse more and more closely with the fundamental word, and, eventually, consciousness of them as distinct elements is lost, as in o-ther, ev-er, daw-n, dar-k.

(4) In transforming old words and begetting new ones, shifts of meaning and sound changes always operate simultaneously. So lord and lady are the end results of such changes wrought in the Old English words, hlaf-ord (formerly hlaf-weard), literally "bread-warder," and hlaf-dige, lit. "bread-kneader." The four most important specific types of sound change are: (1) loss of sounds, as hlaford, (2) vowel-gradation, which is seen in fall, fell and give, gave, (3) mutation, or umlaut, which is the cause of the variations in man, men, goose, geese, choose, choice. (4) vowel heightening and breaking, as the change of ü to ā, ā to ē, and that of ē to i.

The operation of all these divergent forces may be illustrated by the following group of English words. There existed in primitive Indo-European a small group of words, conveniently represented by the so-called "roots" sta and stha. From this source have descended

III. SYNTAX

By JOHN S. P. TATLOCK, PH.D.

Professor in the University of Michigan.

Any brief and systematic discussion of English Syntax, to be profitable, must treat mainly of principles and tendencies. Everyone is familiar with the main outline of the facts as to the mutual relations of words and the structure of the sentence, and the facts in detail are so complex and so nearly innumerable as to require a book for their exposition. And tendencies are changeful in their nature, and principles in their results. Here, therefore, we shall consider Syntax as something which has always lived and grown.

All living languages change. Among races without the steady influence of civilization and literature they change rapidly; so rapidly in Polynesia, it is said, that a traveller returning to an island after an absence of years has scarcely been able to recognize the language. Only the lack in the eighteenth century of the scientific and historical habit of mind accounts for the extraordinary proposal of Dean Swift, that "Some method should be thought on for ascertaining and fixing our language forever, after such alterations in it as shall be thought requisite." While the most changeful elements in language are pronunciation and vocabulary, Syntax, too, submits to the universal law.

By observing the development of the language during some thirteen hundred years, we can see the direction of the change. In general it has been toward the simple, the reasonable and the useful. On the whole, rules have become fewer, less arbitrary, but more invariable. Useless distinctions have been discarded, constructions alike in function have become alike in form, means have become better adapted to ends. Among the happiest changes has been the disappearance (in the thirteenth century) of the three grammatical genders among nouns, and (in the fifteenth century) of the inflection of adjectives and of their distinctions in forms according as they refer to definite or indefinite objects. In particular, the tendency has been away from a synthetic and toward an analytic structure; that is, the relations of words are now shown less by their form and more by their position and the use of particles. This is almost pure gain. Though it requires more words than the older structure, the words are shorter and easier to learn and use. The increased fixity in order is not great enough to involve monotony or real loss of expressiveness, and unquestionably has brought a gain in clearness and ease of use.

It will be juster and clearer to stop a moment here and observe that while the development of the English language has made it perhaps the most practical and otherwise best language in the world, it has still left it imperfect; just as anatomical evolution has left man with some useless and dangerous parts. Perhaps the most noticeable is the lack of a personal pronoun of common gender. It is cumbersome to say, "Everyone must decide his or her own questions"; his alone is often inapt and misleading, and their is still ungrammatical.* Sometimes we miss a clearly plural pronoun of the second person, as when we wish to direct our words to all our hearers, dialects (but not standard English) have developed such makeshifts as you-uns and you-all (Southern). There is no convenient preposition to express cause; such phrases as on account of, by reason of and because of are cumbersome, and through and for often ambiguous or weak. There is no convenient conjunction to express cause, especially at the beginning of a sentence; because is often too strong, since as are often ambiguous, and such phrases as for the reason that, on account of the fact that, are clumsy. But such deficiencies are few.

The causes of change in syntax have been partly external and partly more purely psychological. Among the former were the influence of the Norse tongue in the Anglo-Saxon period, of French beginning in the thirteenth century and of Latin in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, as well as earlier. To-day we can detect the incipient influence (not always salutary) of such conditions as the immense development of business, newspaper headlines, advertising and telegraphing; all of which make for the brief and significant, if often also for the barbarous and violent. More important have been causes within the language itself. Among the principal ones (besides phonetic causes) have been analogy and logic; analogy, which is often due to mental confusion, especially influencing the unintelligent, and logic the somewhat more intelligent. These forces have been at work as far back as we can see, and they are at work to-day. It is true that it is not always easy to point out clear cases where one cause alone has produced an effect, for speech is the product of all the myriad forces working at the same time in the human mind; but it is easy to show the nature of the two tendencies by examples where one or the other has probably predominated.

It is by the analogy of direct statements that we no longer use the subjunctive in quoted statements; but King Alfred wrote "He sæde [said] that that land sie [be, subjunctive] swithe [very] long north [to the north] . . ." In fact, it is by the analogy of the oftener-used indicative that the present subjunctive has nearly disappeared from ordinary modern English. Except in solemn discourse we should never say, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him." The analogy of personal verbs led our ancestors to change methinks (meaning it seems to me) to I think, and me ought (it is incumbent on me) to I ought. Analogy has sometimes produced curious and seemingly illogical constructions. There is nothing illogical, it is true, in "You were sent for" as a passive form for "I sent for you," because send for may be regarded as a loosely compound verb.† But doubtless this analogy is a main source of such an oddity as "I am promised something," based on "You promised me something." And, finally, analogy is responsible for many new constructions which are felt as more or less objectionable. The example of such a sentence as "Studying grammar, I notice my own mistakes in language" has produced what has been called "the derelict participle," as in "Studying grammar, my own mistakes come to mind."* It is because a pronoun in the predicate is usually in the objective case that we often hear "It is me," "It is him"; a construction which can hardly yet be called orthodox, though some grammarians defend the former case. The example of sentences like "Who is it?" has produced so many like "Who did you speak to?" that whom seems ready quite to disappear from the spoken language. Confusion of analogies, especially by Americans and Scotch, has so deranged the future and conditional forms of verbs that when order emerges it will probably be a new order. Forms to express futurity justified by the best usage, such as I shall, I should, shall you, have largely given place in America to such forms as in "I will be sure to go," "I would like to go," "Will you want to go?" Confusion between the preterit subjunctive (which properly has no temporal force) and the preterit indicative has produced such constructions as "If English was [for were] Latin we should [or more likely would] find grammar more difficult."† The general resemblance in meaning between unique and unusual, and between black and dark, has produced such incongruities as more unique and blackest.

*Attempts have been made to introduce the dialectal thon (from that you) and thon's. But language never grows by fiat.

† The number of the verb of course depends somewhat on whether the noun is thought of distributively or collectively.

In these cases other forms in some way associated with those in mind have produced a change which is at variance both with the laws of the language and with reason. With other past and present changes, reason and logic have been the innovator, sometimes judiciously, sometimes not. The best of the two, formerly allowable, is now frowned on. Logic and custom are often at odds in regard to nouns singular in sense but plural in form. We now say a means to an end (formerly a mean), but hesitate between the United States (or the committee) is and are, disapprove of mathematics or measles are, and are disgusted with a woods and a little ways. We sometimes hear debate as to whether we should not say "She looks prettily" instead of "pretty," because the verb is thought to require an adverb (the truth being that when the verb is nearly equivalent to the verb to be, it may take a predicate adjective.) Logic not according to knowledge is responsible for the formula "House to be let," for "to let"; to let is not an active infinitive but an old gerund, a verbal-noun phrase meaning for letting, just as good to eat means good for eating. A similar case is that of such alternative constructions as "The house is building" (formerly a-building, in process of building), or "... is being built," because is building is confused with the continuous present tense active and seems illogical. Yet it is a pity that the older construction should die out, for who would deny the superiority of "The house has been building a year" to "...has been being built a year"? It is false logic, perhaps, applied to a matter rhetorical rather than strictly syntactical, which condemns such a sentence as "A preposition is a bad thing to end a sentence with," and prefers the more clumsy "...with which to end a sentence." But the first form is not as self-convicting as it appears, for with here is not a preposition but an adverb (as many prepositions were originally). It is not, properly speaking, a short-hand form for the second sentence, for to end with is one of the loosely compound verbs already mentioned, and the modifier may as properly come at the end of the sentence as may a German separable prefix.*

†Up, regarded as a preposition in run up the steps, is clearly part of a compound verb in the phrase run up a bill.

We have seen how, by the general law of the universe, the forces which have made the English language what it is are steadily making it other than it is. Change it must, but it may change more rapidly or less, and in general the less rapidly the better, for many reasons. It is a curious fact that at present the changes which might be most beneficial are in general not those which are tending to take place. Change does not occur unopposed, and the forces aiding conservatism are many. Among the chief is the social stigma attaching to noticeable departures from the received forms of the language; though it is singular that the fear of this stigma often capriciously strains at the gnat and swallows the camel, making those whose shall's and will's are hopelessly at odds needlessly careful to pronounce at all as two words. Perhaps equally important is the steadying influence of earlier literature. Other influences are the example of the older members of the community, patriotism (especially in England), the fear of not being understood, the historical sense, and a general feeling for the indecency of wanton disregard of what is established. All these tend to offset the charm of novelty.

More concretely, the basis of conservatism in syntax as elsewhere is to be found in the rules of grammar and in the trend of good usage, which means the practice of the best writers and speakers. Here is the living solidity which keeps linguistic flibustering from carrying all before it. Here, if anywhere, is to be found the answer when a particular form is questioned. If the decree of grammar and usage in regard to syntax is clear, no arguments from analogy or reason avail, for living speech is not a matter of ideal but of reality. Here the function of dictionaries and books of grammar and rhetoric is to codify good usage with full knowledge and intelligence, and all their authority in regard to syntax is a derived authority. Further, the authority of good usage rests not in isolated instances but on general tendency. The fact that sporadic cases of "the split infinitive" (e. g., "to perfectly understand") are to be found from Anglo-Saxon times down, does not make it generally justifiable (though occasionally it may be hard to avoid); any more than Byron's "there let him lay," and Shelley's "Be thou me, impetuous one," justify "It is me," and "Lay down, sir!"

It may have been noticed that this discussion has recognized two points of view toward syntax, one scientific and one æsthetic, the one impartially observing change and the other usually opposing it. Many older writers on the subject tended to be so dogmatic as to be poor guides for the uninstructed, and modern purely scientific grammarians do not pretend to be guides. A rational attitude toward the matter requires us to hold the balance between the two, and the greatest help to doing so is an intelligently historical point of view, for history both loves the past and recognizes that it is past, interprets the present yet knows it is not final. Without wide reading a knowledge of the history of the language and a knowledge of the speech-usages of other parts of the English-speaking world, the judicious person will hesitate to be dogmatic about idioms and unusual constructions. In particular, this point of view is desirable in those in positions of authority, writers of text-books, and teachers. It prevents venerable and serviceable idioms from being condemned because they are not easy to parse, and personal or national whims and antipathies from being erected into canons.* It promotes a generous and vital attitude toward questions of usage, shows that many are not questions of right and wrong but of better and worse, that the requirements of formal and informal writing and talking are all and have always been different, and discourages not only slovenliness but also priggishness and dogmatism. The practical effect of the historical attitude can hardly be better summed up than in the familiar words of Pope's Essay on Criticism:

* This is not meant to deny the rhetorical principle that unimportant words are usually better put in an inconspicuous part of the sentence.

"In words, as fashions, the same rule will hold:
Alike fantastic, if too new, or old;
Be not the first by whom the new are try'd,
Nor yet the last to lay the old aside."

IV. PUNCTUATION

PUNCTUATION is the art of pointing written composition in such a manner as may naturally lead to its proper meaning, construction, and delivery; and it thus indicates the several pauses, or rests, between sentences, and parts of sentences, according to their proper quantity or proportion, as they are expressed in just and accurate pronunciation.

The following are the principal stops or pauses in a sentence, viz., the comma (,), the semicolon (;), the colon (:), the period, or full point (.), the note of admiration or exclamation (!), and the note of interrogation (?).

The comma (,) is a pause in reading, or slight break in sense, and is mostly used to distinguish nouns, verbs, adjectives, and adverbs; as, "It is very difficult to make fine pictures, handsome statues, good music, good verses." It likewise prevents ambiguity in the sense: as, "Epistolary writing, by which a great part of the commerce of human life is carried on, was esteemed by the Romans a liberal and polite accomplishment." When an address is made to a person, answering to the vocative case in Latin, a comma is placed before and after the noun: as, "Commune with thyself, O man, and consider wherefore thou wast made."

The semicolon (;) is a pause somewhat longer than the comma, and is used to distinguish the different members or parts of a sentence: as, "A vain hope flattereth the heart of a fool; but he who is wise pursueth it not. Be grateful to thy father, for he gave thee life; and to thy mother, for she sustained thee."

The colon (:) is a pause in reading of still greater length, and shows the preceding sentence to be perfect and entire, only that some remark, further illustration, or other matter connected therewith, is subjoined: as, "He who giveth away his treasure wisely, giveth away his plagues: he who retaineth its increase, heapeth up sorrow."

The period, or full point (.), indicates a complete or temporary rest of the voice, and denotes a full and perfect sentence, which is always distinguished by this point: as, "A noble spirit disdaineth the malice of fortune. His greatness of soul is not to be cast down."

The note of admiration (!) is used to express wonder, or exclamation.

* Between alternative colloquial forms like someone else's and someone's else one may have his preference; yet he is not justified in being dogmatic.

tion: as, "Who art thou, O man! who presumest on thine own wisdom?"

The note of interrogation (?) is used to show when a question is asked: as, "What day of the month is this?" It likewise distinguishes a real question from a sentence in the imperative mood: as, "Do you hear me?"

Besides the above points, there are other marks made use of in books and writing as references, or to point out something remarkable or defective: as,

Accent (´) placed over a vowel, or the last consonant of a syllable, shows the stress of the voice, in pronouncing a word, to be on that syllable over or immediately before which it is placed.

Apostrophe (´), is a comma placed over a word, to denote the omission of a letter, for the sake of a quicker pronunciation: as, plac'd for placed, ne'er for never.

Asterism, or asterisk (*), a star, and Parallel (||), direct to some note at the foot of the page.

Obelisk or Dagger (†), refers likewise to some note in the margin, &c.; and in dictionaries it commonly shows the word to be obsolete.

The Index, or Hand (☞), points to some very remarkable passage.

Breve (˘) over a vowel, denotes that it sounds short.

Circumflex (ˆ), or (˘), is placed over a vowel to denote a long syllable: as, Euphrátes, or Euphrâtes.

Diaeresis (¨), consists of two points placed over one of two conjoining vowels, thus dividing them into two syllables: as, aërial.

Hyphen (-), is a short line to join syllables or words together.

Makron (marked ¯) over a vowel shows this vowel to be long.

Parenthesis, marked thus (), serves to include a sentence which might be omitted, without any prejudice to the general meaning; notwithstanding it may be necessary for the explanation thereof: as, "Pardon me (added she, embracing me), I now believe what you say."

Dash (—), is used when the sense breaks off abruptly, or is temporarily suspended and continued after a short interruption. A double dash, at beginning and end of an introduced phrase, is now frequently employed in place of the parenthesis.

Bracket, or Crotchct, thus [], includes such a word from the sentence as serves to explain the word immediately preceding: as, "A treatise of [concerning] English Grammar."

Paragraph (¶), denotes the beginning of a new subject.—The pause here may be greater than a period.

Section (§), is used to divide a chapter into less particular arguments.

Ellipsis, marked thus (—), or (...), denotes that part of a word is left out: as, K—g, for King.

Caret (^), is placed underneath a line to show that some letter, word or sentence is left out by mistake, and must be inserted exactly in that place.

Quotation ("), is a double comma reversed at the beginning of a line, which shows that a passage is quoted, or transcribed, from some author in his own words.

V. VERSIFICATION AND PROSODY

By CHARLES F. JOHNSON, A.M., PH.D.

Professor in Trinity College, Hartford, Connecticut.

A poem is a structure, but it is more than a structure, it is an organism. The writer puts into it a portion of his own spiritual vitality, so that, as Dr. Johnson says, "poetry pleases by exhibiting an idea more grateful to the mind than things themselves afford." The analysis or separating the structure into parts, is prosodical criticism; examining why the presentation of the idea is pleasing, striking, effective, and perhaps sublime, is æsthetic criticism. Prosody might be made a science if we had some more exact instrument for measuring the duration and quality of spoken verse, than the human ear, were it not that to be worth considering a poem must appeal by means of its prosodical structure to human feeling. Emotion cannot be scientifically treated except in a vague, tentative and unsatisfactory manner. A poem may be prosodically correct and yet absolutely worthless. But it cannot be a poem without a prosodical skeleton. In dealing with English prosody, or with English versification in a broad sense, we are dealing with a subject of great importance, but one in which the human ear is the criterion, a judge whose decisions cannot be exactly tested, and further, with a subject whose importance depends entirely on something not itself, accompanying it or added to it, the artistic appeal to human emotion.

A collection of words constituting a verse or line of poetry is easily recognizable from its structure. For example, the words, would be declared verse at once by the reader because they mark time. In reading it we naturally make four beats, instinctive movements of the hand or head. On looking further we see that all the lines of the poem have the same peculiarity and we conclude that this is the general law of the verses of that poem, though sometimes the beats are not so marked as in the opening line. The beats coincide with the syllables "sen," "plant," "gard" and "grew," which we recognize at once as the accented syllables. But if we write:

"A sensitive plant in a garden grew,"

"A sensitive plant grew in a garden"

we see at once here is not a poetical line though we might surmise as before that the "sensitive plant" meant a human soul, and "the garden" human society, or the world. The symbolical or suggested meaning is not affected, but the structure is destroyed. The four accents remain, but two of them, those on "plant" and "grew," are close together. We therefore conclude that a verse of poetry consists of accented syllables separated by one or more unaccented ones, or by pauses. An examination of other poems at once confirms this view.

THE ACCENT AND THE FOOT

The Latin and Greek critics, in whose languages much fine poetry was written, considered that the syllables were long and short; they regarded duration rather than force as marking them. They recognized that the short syllables were associated with the long syllables just as we recognize accented syllables as agglutinated to unaccented ones to form feet. To these feet they gave names, as trochee—a long and short syllable, imabus—a short and long, spondee—two long syllables, dactyl—a long followed by two shorts, anapest—two shorts followed by a long, and a few other combinations. They also considered that the time occupied in enunciating a short syllable was half that required by a long one. These names are retained in English prosody for convenience; an iambus is an unaccented syllable followed by an accented one, and so forth. The term, "foot" is retained for the agglutinated syllables constructing a metrical unit. The old marks (~) for long and short are also used in English prosody, though they mean accented and unaccented. English from its earliest history is preëminently an accented language, and accent as applied to it means stress or force, not pitch, as it meant when used by the Greeks. The regular feet are the iamb (~ -), the trochee (- ~), the anapest (~ ~ -), the dactyl (- ~ ~), the amphibrach (~ - ~). A single long syllable may constitute a foot if followed by a pause, rhetorical or grammatical, or at the end of a line, where a pause (very short) is always to be made. The spondee (- -) is substantially out of the question, though, since monosyllables are nearly all accented, two accents may fall together, as "far down," in the line. Then one of these takes the principal accent and throws the other into comparative obscurity, according to the requirements of the beat. For the same reason the pyrrhic (~ ~) and the tribrach (~ ~ ~) have no place. Nor have the four-syllable feet like the Ionic (- - ~ ~). When a line of verse can be scanned as Ionics it will be found that the natural reading marks trochees or anapests if some of the syllables are evidently acoustically unimportant.

Stress is practically the same as accent, but is usually applied to cases where a weak accent is reinforced to make the beat evident, as in the case where two accented monosyllables come together and one must be given the leadership. Even when the meaning requires a slow and distinct enunciation of each syllable so as to give a spondaic effect, it will be found that one syllable still carries the metrical accent and that these stresses are nearly, perhaps absolutely, spaced in time.

THE LINE

The feet can be combined in many ways to make lines of poetry. The most common is the five-accent iambic line, of which the best exemplar is Pope. Lines are individualized in the pages of a book by special printing, in reading, by a short pause at the end, which is frequently marked by a rhyme. The shortest line may be taken as one of two accents, though single words may be printed as a refrain. The favorite metre of Burns consists of three four-accent lines, a two-accent line, another four-accent line, and a two-accent line terminating the stanza or group of lines:

"Ev'n thóu | who mournst | the Daf | sy's fâte,
That fâte | is thine | —no dís | tant dáte,
Stern Rú | in's plów | share drives, | éláte,
Full ón | thy doóm."

The feet in the above are iambic.

Hood's "Bridge of Sighs" is in lines of two accents:

"One more, un | fórtunate,
Wéary of | bréath,
Ráshly im | pórtunate,
Góne to her | déath."

Here the feet are of three syllables, dactyls and amphibraches, except the terminals "breath" and "death," which with the following pause have the temporal value of iambs.

Three-accent lines are found in the second and fourth line of ballad metre and the "Common metre" of hymns, the other two lines of the stanza being marked with four accents. The hymn:

"From Greén | land's í | cy móuntains,
From fn | dia's cór | al stránd."

is an example of three-accent lines.

The four-accent line is very frequently used by poets. When seven syllables are used, the last bears a heavy accent and with the pause is equivalent to a trochee:

"Ám I | lóved as | ónce were | théy,
In the | óld ím | pássioned | wáy?"

The well-known hymn "Rock of Ages" is an example of the same metre:

"Róck of | Áges | cléft for | mé,
Lét me | híde my | sélf in | Theé."

The lines might be scanned as iambs by taking the first foot to be the single long syllable, but it seems more consonant with the natural rhythm to consider the final syllables with the pause as making up the time. If a line is regarded as beginning with a single syllable, it is called "acephalous," if, as ending with a single syllable, "catalectic."

The five-accent line is the most common for sustained verse. Used by Shakespeare and Milton without rhyme, it is known as blank verse and consists for the most part of ten syllables, and the beat is iambic. Used with coupled rhymes by Pope and many others it is known as the heroic couplet:

"Should súch | a mán |, too fónð | to rúle | alóne,
Bear líke |, the Túrk | in bróth | er néar | the thróne."

The above quotation shows, too, how, when two monosyllables bearing normally accents of about equal importance, as "Should such," "too fond," "bear like," come together, either of them can be made to carry the rhythmical accent to suit the general character of the metre whether trochaic or iambic.

The six-accent line is found in the Alexandrine which closes the Spenserian stanza of the "Faërie Queen," "Adonais," "Childe Harold" and other poems. This, however, as well as the seven-accent verse, is apt to split up in normal reading into two shorter lines, as grammatical or rhetorical considerations almost invariably divide the time into clauses at the end of a foot. A convincing example of this is Tennyson's "Locksley Hall":

"Cómrades, léave me hère a líttle, | wíle as yét t'ís eárlý mórn,
Léave me hère, and wén you wánt me, | blów upón the búgíe hórñ."

It is almost impossible to read these lines of fifteen syllables except as two lines of eight and seven with four accents on each.

The prevalent foot gives the rhythmical character to the line. If iambic, the line is normally dignified, if trochaic, the line is lively, if of three-syllable feet, it may be expressive of either emotion, rhetorically eloquent, as in Hood's "Bridge of Sighs," or merry, as in his "Miss Kilmansegg." Very musical effects are obtained in fortunate instances in the use of either foot as the norm, but this depends on the sequence of syllable sound, rather than on the sequence of accents.

As rhythm is the basis of verse and as the accents mark the rhythm, it is evident that the accented syllables are far more important than the unaccented ones or the pauses that divide them. Therefore, if care is taken not to bring two strongly accented syllables into juxtaposition, trochees can be found in iambic lines and the reverse, a dactyl can readily fill the place of an anapest, or two-syllable and three-syllable feet can be interchanged. None but poets who can detect at once a misplaced accent which breaks the rhythm can use this license. Examples of this "equivalence" are found in Milton's "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso," in Coleridge's "Christabel," in Shelley's "Sensitive Plant" and many other poems.

RHYME

Since the day of Chaucer, rhyme, coming into England from France and Italy, has generally marked the ends of lines. A true rhyme imposes identity of the vowel sound of the last accented syllables and its consonant and identity of the following unaccented syllable, if there be any, and dissimilarity of the consonants preceding the accented syllable. "Flowers" and "Hours" are a rhyming pair, and so are "Sorrow" and "To-morrow." As our vowel sounds grade so finely similarity is allowed, but identity is the rule. The rule is so far relaxed as to allow an unaccented terminal to take the rhyme as "Eternity" and "Me." As the function of the rhyme is to make a pleasing echo to individualize the line, and to add to the artistic complexity of the structure, there is no reason for insisting on the letter of the law, nor have poets ever done so.

THE STANZA

The stanza is a group of lines as the line is a group of feet, and may be called the metrical paragraph. As the accent beat, the number of feet in the lines, the number of lines in the stanza, and the position of the rhymes may all vary, the possible combinations are infinite, from the couplet to the fourteen-line sonnet. Chaucer, in the fourteenth century, imported stanzaic forms from France and Italy. Lyrical stanzas were imitated from the French of Ronsard and the other "Pleiads" in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Mr. Swinburne in the nineteenth, showed an astonishing genius in inventing new stanzas of great beauty, many of them of the anapestic and dactylic movement. The standards are the sonnet in both forms—Italian and English—ballad measure, the heroic couplet, and the octo-syllabic couplet. In the Pope heroic couplet the lines are usually grammatical phrases, so that a pause or mark of punctuation comes at the end. These are known as "end-stopt" lines and give the poem a crisp, epigrammatic character. In most lyrical verse and in the usage of Keats and others in the five-accent line, the grammatical structure does not coincide with the metrical structure, but the word at the end of the line is bound up with the word at the beginning of the next line. This is known as "overflow verse," and has a more careless and fluent movement.

What has been said applies only to the mechanics of verse. The art is exercised for the most part instinctively, as the primitive men struck the rhythmic accents correctly in their communal choruses and dances. But artistry has added new elements in the long course of time. The syllables which carry the accents and the syllables between them are elements of human speech; vowel sounds closed by consonants. As such they have their own beauty enhanced by orderly succession. They may vary in pitch, they may be prolonged or shortened. They fill the bare accented outline with ornament, which may be called color or music by way of analogy to other arts. Furthermore, the words are symbols of things and ideas and are surrounded with an aura of associations. When these harmonize in some indefinable manner with the underlying rhythmical beat the effect is far greater than any that can be produced by prose. The poetic structure then becomes organic and living and exemplifies in the fullest the art not only of versification, but of poetry. But there can be no poetry without versification. Poetic prose, as in Coleridge's "Cain," may have a loose rhythm of its own and some of the suggestive glamour of poetry, but it is not poetry except in a borrowed sense, as architecture is "frozen music." The regular rhythmic beat, old as man and elemental as gravitation, is wanting, and that is the base of poetry. The superstructure erected on another base becomes itself a different thing, not poetry but poetic prose.

SIMPLIFIED SPELLING

The body known as the SIMPLIFIED SPELLING BOARD, in Circular No. 2, issued March 21, 1906, mentions twenty distinguishable classes of words, and includes a list of three hundred common words spelled in two ways, of which the BOARD says: "choose the simpler spelling."

The twenty distinguishable classes of words, arranged in the alphabetical order of the letters or affixes affected, are as follows:

1. Words spelled with AE or E. Rule: Choose E. Ex.: Anesthetic, esthetic, medieval, etc.

2. Words spelled with -DGE-MENT or -DG-MENT. Rule: Omit E. Ex.: Abridgment, acknowledgment, judgment, lodgment.

3. Words spelled with -ED or -T, the preceding single consonant being doubled before -ED (pped, -ssed) and left single before -T (-pt, -st). Rule: Choose -T in all cases. Ex.: dript, dropt, stept, stopt, etc., blest, prest, distrest, mist, etc., blusht, husht, washt, etc.

(Forms like these being inflections, are commonly omitted in the dictionary lists of words spelled in two or more ways, but they are genuine historical spellings and cannot be ignored. Some are very ancient (for example, kist is Anglo-Saxon cyste, and mist is Anglo-Saxon miste), and all are frequent and normal in English literature from Spenser, Shakespeare, and Milton to Tennyson and Lowell. For example, Milton has compast, languisht, vanquisht, admonisht, astonisht, diminisht, polisht, worshipt, supt, ceast, linkt, matcht, scorcht, etc. This, however, was before there was any standard of spelling at all, but when men spelled by ear, so that Shakespeare, for example, wrote his own name in several different ways.)

4. Words spelled with -ENCE or -ENSE (Latin -ENS-A). Rule: Choose -ENSE. Ex.: Defensc, offense, pretense.

5. Words spelled with -ETTE or -ET. Rule: Omit -TE. Ex.: Coquet, epaulet, etiquette, omelet, etc.

6. Words spelled with GH or F. Rule: Choose F. Ex.: Draft.

7. Words spelled with -GH or without. (1) -OUGH or -OW. Rule: Choose -OW. Ex.: Plow. (2) -OUGH or O. Rule: Choose -O. Ex.: Altho (Bunyan), tho (Bunyan), thoro, boro (in place names). Bunyan, however, was a very illiterate man and knew nothing of orthography and its laws.

8. Words with the verb suffix, of Greek origin, spelled -ISE or -IZE. Rule: Choose -IZE. Ex.: Catechize, criticize, exorcize, legalize, etc.

9. Words spelled with -ITE or -IT. Rule: Omit E. Ex.: Deposit, preterit.

10. Words spelled with -LL or -L (-ILL or -IL). Rule: Choose -L. Ex.: Distil, fulfil, instil.

11. Words spelled with -LL-NESS or -L-NESS. Rule: Omit one L. Ex.: Dulness, fulnes.

12. Words spelled with -MME or -M. Rule: Omit -ME. Ex.: Gram, program.

13. Words spelled with OE or E. Rule: Choose E. Ex.: Ecumenical, esophagus.

14. Words spelled with -OUR or -OR. Rule: Choose -OR. Ex.: Favor, fervor, flavor, honor, labor, rigor, rumor, tenor, tumor, valor, vapor, vigor.

15. Words spelled with -PH or -F. Rule: Choose -F. Ex.: Fantasm, fantasy, fantom, sulfate, sulfur.

16. Words spelled with -BB or -B. Rule: Omit one B. Ex.: Bur, pur.

17. Words spelled with -RE or -ER. Rule: Choose -ER. Ex.: Center, meter, miter, niter, sepulcher, theater.

18. Words spelled with s or z (in the root). Rule: Choose z. Ex.: Apprize, assize, comprize, raze, surprize, teazel.

19. Words spelled with s- or sc-. Rule: Omit c. Ex.: Simitar, sithe.

20. Words spelled with or without silent -VE. Rule: Omit -VE. Ex.: Catalog, decalog, demagog, pedagog, prolog.

The practical objection to Simplified Spelling is this: It represents the pronunciation of the present day, figured phonetically or by ear. But pronunciation changes from century to century, and if spelling is to change with it, instead of remaining practically fixed and according to a standard, books printed now in the Simplified Spelling will become unintelligible and will need to have their words re-spelled. Thus, Spenser's "Faëry Queene," written in the time of Queen Elizabeth, can scarcely be understood at the present time, and therefore is issued in the spelling of to-day. Whereas, if there had been a normal spelling, the fine old books, printed two or three hundred years ago, would be the same as those of to-day in their orthography. Few realize that changes in pronunciation are extremely numerous from decade to decade. If these changes are to be reflected in a continually altered spelling, then the written language has nothing stable about it. Likewise few will agree or have agreed upon the Simple Spelling. A few leisurely gentlemen, subsidized by a multimillionaire, make lists, such as that above, yet not even all promulgators of the lists are willing to use them, much less the great mass of the people.

A (ǣ or a), the first letter in nearly every alphabet in the world, the chief exceptions being the Old Germanic (Runic), where it stood in the fourth place, and the Ethiopic, where it is the thirteenth letter. It was possibly in its earlier form a pictograph, representing an ox's head; but recent research has made this doubtful.

a (ǣ), indef. art. (contraction of an), one; any; used before words beginning with a consonant or the aspirate h.

aback (a-bak'), adv. backward; pressed back against the mast: said of sails; by surprise.

abacus (ab'a-kus), n. a contrivance of beads or balls strung upon rods or wires: used for arithmetical computation by the Chinese, and called by them swanpan. The abacus was probably at first developed from the ten digits of the human hand, which was a natural counting-board, the slab crowning a column or pillar.

abaft (a-baft'), adv. & prep. at, towards, or in the direction of the stern of a ship; astern.

abalser (a-bā'sēr), n. bone black, also called animal black. It is used in refining petroleum.

abandon (a-ban'dun), v.t. to give up; desert or forsake utterly; give up all claim to; yield one's self; n. unrestraint; freedom of manner. [French.]

abandoned (a-ban'dund), adj. given up entirely; shamelessly profligate.
